

Greetings Griffins,

During lunch on Tuesday, February 27th, Glendale Prep will welcome Professor Paul Carrese from the newly established School of Civic and Economic Thought and Leadership at Arizona State University. Professor Carrese is one of the driving forces behind the opening of this new and outstanding opportunity at ASU and is excited to share the many ways that this new school can benefit future students.

What is the School of Civic and Economic Thought and Leadership?

This is the description from the school's website:

“Are you interested in social issues? Concerned that American politics is angry and divisive? Would you like to improve humanity through building consensus and finding a common good? Do you sense that studying historical works about life and politics could provide a sound platform for solving current problems? If you answered yes to any of these, you're an excellent candidate for a degree or minor in Civic and Economic Thought and Leadership.”

The School of Civic and Economic Thought and Leadership helps prepare students for careers in law, public safety, education, business, politics, technology, foreign service, journalism, and many more. If you are interested in any of these careers, be sure to attend Professor Carrese's presentation. You can sign up to attend using Naviance.
